If you are in the military you are probably used to moving a lot. Military moving programs have been developed to help the needs military families have when they move. Your moving can entail moving to different bases in the Continental United States (CONUS) or to bases overseas. Other types of military moving will need deployment storage. As you can see there are all kinds of moving needs that the average citizen does not have. When a soldier or his family is involved in moving they need to put in a change of address as possible. Parents should also get a copy of the current school records for their children. Medical and dental records need to be kept current too.

There are certain military offices that handle moving. One such office for moving is the Joint Personal Property Shipping Office. To help make a military move less stressful the soldier should talk with his or her Personal Property entitlement counselor. Moving can also be done on a do DITY bases. If you are moving on DITY bases the government reimburses military moving costs upon approval. Military moving expenses can be covered this way. Military moving done on your own may be more convenient for some families.

Every military base has approved moving companies that can come to your home on base and pack up your belongs and make the move for you. They know how to follow the military moving protocol. They pack up and move everything in the house for you. When everything according to certain specifications a military inspector will approve it. Of course this is for houses on base. Off base living allows for military families to do their own military moving the way they want to do it. The military will then reimburse the family for their military moving expenses. When long distance military moving is needed the family can be reimbursed for up to 3 nights in a motel and for meals they eat during their drive. The family can use rental moving trucks. However, the truck rental is limited to the mileage from base to base. The military will reimburse the family for a commercial flight for military moving overseas if a military jumper flight is not available to them. The costs of moving household items oversea is reimbursed if an approved military moving company is used. For mandatory military moving it is important to only hire approved military moving companies.
